Apropos of your reply to T. W. J. on the "First Atlantic Cable." will you kindly Inform me what became of the Great Eastern? Was she built expressly for the purpose of laying cable, and had she any defeots? In what part was the broken up, if obsolete? READER. The steamship Great Eastern was designed by I. K. Brunel and built by Scott. Russell & Co., at Millwall, England, for travel east around the Cape of Good Hope. The company undertaking this route figured that on account of the cost of maintaining coaling stations a vessel would not pay unless large enough to carry coal for the voyage out and back, a large number of passengers and a great carge. So the Great Eastern was designed and built. She was 632 feet long, 83 feet wide and was divided into eleven was feet long as a feet wide and was divided into eleven wateright compariments.
